In a speech at the inauguration ceremony, the Supreme Leader of the Islamic Revolution asked God Almighty to bless this hopeful day for the people and the country, calling the nation's presence in the presidential election completely meaningful and a symbol of religious democracy. The Twelfth Government also wished success and special divine care to Mr Raisi and his colleagues in the new government.

He described the inauguration ceremony as based on the constitution and the tradition established by Imam Khomeini (RA). He added: "This ceremony is a manifestation of the significant issue of" rational, calm and firm transfer "in the executive branch and in fact in the management of the country."

The Supreme Leader of the Revolution called the existence of political diversity one of the most important themes of the endorsement ceremony and added: "Different political tendencies of governments show political diversity in the country, and this fact is a sign of freedom and authentication of elections."

Referring to the holding of elections with rightfulness and security, he sincerely thanked all the relevant bodies conducting the elections and providing order and safety, especially the dear Iranian nation. He added: there was a conspiracy of boycotting the election directed by the outsider enemies while some people from inside followed the same line out of negligence and some people may be followed them purposefully, but the nation responded decisively and, by understanding the situation, had a good turnout in the elections.

Ayatollah Khamenei called the changes in the executive administration as a matter of hope and said: "The presence of new people with new wills and new initiatives creates hope for everyone, especially the youth, which has to be appreciated."

He added: "This shift is also an opportunity for those who have thoughts and opinions to find the mistakes of the past with care, reflection, and offer solutions."

The Supreme Leader of the Islamic Revolution, referring to the reliance on the values of the revolution in Mr Raisi's election campaign, emphasised: This right path must continue because it brings the nation to its fundamental rights and lifts Iran to its worthy position.

Furthermore, he said: "The values of the revolution are not imaginary concepts but have been clearly and repeatedly stated in the words of the great Imam (Khomeini), and these words should be the criterion and followed."

The Supreme Leader of the Revolution considered the nation's stepping into various issues as the primary key to solving problems. He added: "Pursuing the values of the revolution increases the motivation of the people and their act in different fields, is a valuable and effective one, which is irreplaceable and has no alternative for it."

Ayatollah Khamenei called the transformation of people from a passive and scattered group into a united, motivated, purposeful and idealistic nation as the central masterpiece of the revolution and the Imam (Khomeini). Then he said: "Any factor and element that can increase the unity, motivation and hope of the nation and brings people closer to each other, must be appreciated as the values of the revolution contain this type of determinative factor.

Referring to Mr Raisi's election slogans of "being from the people, for the people, and among the people," the Supreme Leader said: "Being from the people is a critical issue, and the esteemed president and his colleagues must try to turn this slogan into the reality." It has to be valid from the people and for the people, without considering any class, group or privileges.

Ayatollah Khamenei pointed out: Of course, being among the people should not cause them to neglect the nation's elites, as paying particular attention to the elites is necessary and valuable.

Emphasising that the government should be the manifestation of the national consent and a compassionate attitude towards the people, the revolution's leader added: "One of the important things that help the government be popular is the commitment to have an honest dialogue with the people without political affiliation." It is necessary to speak honestly with the people, state the problems and solutions, express the expectations, and provide the required assistance to the people.

Ayatollah Khamenei's following advice to the 13th government was to recognise the country's great potentialities and pay serious attention to them.

He said: "These days, it is said that the country's problems and shortcomings are many, While the country's capacities in the fields of water, oil, mines, having a large domestic market, neighbours and the amazing talents and readiness of the youth are far beyond the problems and extraordinary."

The Leader of the Revolution pointed out: "There is no doubt, with these capacities, we can solve the problems, as long as they are well known and then used with tireless efforts around the clock."

Ayatollah Khamenei described another aspect of being from the people, as the relentless fight against corruption and corrupters and added: "Mr Raisi, in his previous official post, started the fight against corruption and took adequate measures to prevent the corruption. This struggle must be continued seriously.

He cited tax evasion, unwarranted monopolies, unhealthy commercial activities, and preferred currency misuse as examples of corruption that must be tackled with planning and following-up.

Ayatollah Khamenei said that solving economic problems requires a plan and moving according to the general plan. He said: "Problems cannot be solved with daily work and unforeseen actions, while everyone knows that solving economic problems is time-consuming and officials must make every effort." By this time, the plan should be as short as possible.

He called the forming of the government at its earliest time as necessary action and added: the country's conditions do not allow you to delay the formation of the government. So the esteemed President should hurry in introducing the proposed ministers, and the Islamic parliament must act in reviewing the qualifications of the ministers as soon as possible.

The final point mentioned by the Supreme Leader of the Revolution was the issue of a propaganda war.

Ayatollah Khamenei, referring to the enemies efforts to influence and dominate the public opinion of countries, including the Iranian people, through soft war and propaganda and media war, said: If the general opinion of a nation is given to the hands of foreigners, then the country will move according to their will.

The Supreme Leader of the Revolution pointed out the weakness and inefficiency in the media and propaganda work inside the country and noted: we should act more robust and more innovative in these issues.

In this ceremony, Hujjat al-Islam Raisi, the President of the Islamic Republic of Iran, thanked all the people and his supporters and said: "In the last elections, the nation, despite all the financial and health problems, disappointed its enemies and gave hope to its friends."

Mr Raisi, by mentioning the messages understood by the last successful elections; as the demand for change, justice, the fight against poverty, corruption, discrimination and rent-seeking, the protection of the values of the revolution, the need to solve problems and, in a word, change the current situation to the best one, He said: the existing issues such as debt, budget deficits, unemployment, shortage of houses caused by hostilities, as well as some internal inefficiencies, need to be rectified, and people expect their damaged trust to be restored.

Emphasising that we had problems wherever the leadership's instructions were ignored, the President said: "We will seek to lift the sanctions, but we will not tie the people's need to the will of foreigners."

Mr Raisi said: "The budget deficit, capital market stability, inflation control, the pandemic, the issue of water and electricity are among the important issues that need to be addressed urgently". He said: The government has prepared a short term plan to solve ten urgent issues.

The President added: The four-year transformation plan, which will soon be made available to experts, will pave the way for the implementation of the seventh development plan."

In this ceremony, the Interior Minister also reported on the 13th presidential election.

Mr Rahmani Fazli, "Rule of law, fidelity, impartiality, complete security, healthy competition, maximum participation and maintaining the rights of executives, candidates and voters" in order to increase political enthusiasm and public participation are among the principles of holding elections and said: The Guardian Council has declared the elections legal without invalidating even one ballot box.
